Imagine a list of functions in some file. I want to create a class that takes them all into account to compute a value. Is this possible to do without turning the functions into classes? A: You can use MooseX::Deprecate to create a new trait to encapsulate the functionality of your list of functions. By using this module, you can add behaviors to a class on initialization, removing the need to explicitly call a method at the end of every object's creation. This is described at the MooseX::Deprecate docs. A: In the same way as f678ea9f9e
